A COOL DAY

By Juanita Hamel

CHILL as blow the breezes of November, no wind could be so cold as that which strips the tree of hope of every leafy expectation when HER welcome is frigid. The heart that leaped high when he saw her, sank like lead in an ocean of despair when he realized that instead of charm and warmth, chill and cold were his portion—but why? This is the question which HIS heart alone can answer!

FAMOUS "WITS" OF HISTORY

Little Stories of Men and Women Whose Sayings Are Still Remembered By MARK STUYVESANT

In the "Savage Club Papers" for 1868 there is an amusing article from the pen of Dr. Hingston, who acted as advance agent for Artemus Ward on his lecture tour through the far Western states and territories. The Savage Club, by the way, is a club of London, Eng., and its name has nothing to do with the story the doctor wrote for the club papers, although it might well have been invented for this special purpose. Dr. Hingston tells of how they went to the town of Austin, and what happened there.

Austin was then a mining camp only a year old. It had a court house, however, and a newspaper. The fame of Artemus Ward had preceded him, and the city was out to welcome him. The judge offered his court house for the lecture. But there was a new granite store just completed, and although it had no lights, it seemed a better place for a lecture.

When lecture time arrived Artemus led the way to the store with a lamp he had borrowed from the hotel. Most he gave what the Austin Revue declared was "The pioneer lecture in the Shoshone nation."

This it was, in fact for no other lecturer had up to then braved the dangers of the Sierras. So successful was this lecture that Big Creek, a mining camp twelve miles away, sent a deputation to ask that the lecture be repeated there. Perils lay in wait on the way, but Hingston felt he would be able to withstand them. He had bought a big revolver, and carried it. Artemus had also bought "a gun," but he kept his weapon at the bottom of his trunk. He called Hingston "Warrior."

"Well do it, Warrior!" Artemus roared. "Only take care to have at the bottom of the handbills, 'Admission, one scalp. Front seats, two scalps.'"

The Young America Saloon was the "lecture hall." Hingston says that one hundred and fifty miners, each paid three dollars. There they sat on kegs and on the floor, and Artemus lectured while the barkeeper yelled his applause as loud as the rest, who laughed themselves hoarse over "Babe in the Woods."

After the lecture Artemus and Hingston started for Austin in the buggy in which they had driven over. Suddenly, out of the night appeared a band of redskins. They captured the lecturer before his manager could draw the famous revolver. They made Artemus and Hingston get out of the buggy, and kept them on their knees under guard for half an hour. At last one of the Shoshones demanded in bad English Artemus's name:

"Artemus Ward," was the reply between teeth that chattered, not from fear, but from the frigid weather. "Wia-r-r-r-a-he: Uot Uot Uot! Americano talker man!" the Shoshone leader yelled. He made a lunge for Artemus's scalp, while the band shouted: "Talker! Talker!"

Artemus did his best to address them. He began a "lecture," but the Indians wouldn't listen. Still he kept on until one of the band cried: "Bosh."

The incident was ended right then and there, for Artemus now realized that his Indian captives were joking. When they had all finished laughing the band gave the shivering Artemus and Hingston something warm to drink and escorted them back to Austin—with a warning not to be careless again in a wild country.

Husband Charges Wife Took Skirts, She is Acquitted

Louis and Mary Ori Air Troubles in City Court Saturday Morning.

Married and divorced and again remarried, Louis S. Ori and his wife, Mary, brought their troubles to city court Saturday and before a courtroom filled to overflowing with neighbors curious as to the outcome of the trials, recited to their allegations and denials of their family quarrel over "hobby's shirts."

Mary was found not guilty by the evidence. The testimony, which revealed the cause for the Ori's disagreement was over the presence of Frances Geroby, newly arrived sister of Mrs. Ori from Europe, was filled with charges and denials concerning the alleged theft by the wife of her husband's clothing.

The Oris separated on Nov. 20, Mrs. Ori and her sister, going to the home of Charles Horvath, 1206 Diamond av., and taking with them the home furnishings which she alleged belonged to her, leaving behind wearing apparel and linen belonging to her husband. Ori swore out a warrant for his wife's arrest and she was taken into custody on charges of grand larceny, the arrest being made after 2 o'clock last Monday morning, it is said.
